

Corporate responsibility

<http://english.aljazeera.net/news/africa/2009/11/200911192747615233.html>

Thousands of people in Ivory Coast poisoned by toxic waste face being cheated out of $45m in compensation after the money, which was deposited in a bank account in the West African country, was frozen. At the same time, a local figure, claiming to be president of the National Co-ordination of Toxic Waste Victims of Cote d'Ivoire and who is unknown to the victims' lawyers, has now applied to have the cash moved to the association's account. The victims' lawyer, has raised fears that corruption could be behind the latest developments in the case, which centres around the dumping of hundreds of tonnes of sulphur-contaminated oil waste by a ship near Abidjan, the capital, in 2006. Thousands of people became ill following the incident and Trafigura, a Dutch-based commodities trader who chartered the vessel, agreed to pay compensation to the victims in an out-of-court settlement in September.

'Shadowy figure'

The compensation money was deposited in an Ivorian bank to be handed out, directly, in cash, to each of the 30,000 victims, but the payments were frozen last month. Day told Al Jazeera the individual applying for the money was a "shadowy figure" and said he was "extremely worried" about the move. "The Ivorians we know have been very scared to tell us who it is," he said. "They say to us he's not a politician; so it's not somebody within government, but it's said to be somebody who's very well connected, very wealthy, and with lots of power and influence within the state. "The application was so that the transfer could be made immediately. Fortunately, the court last week decided not to immediately transfer it

Arms

Two Nobel Peace laureates, Archbishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa and human rights activist Adolfo Pérez Esquivel of Argentina, have publicly endorsed the Swiss campaign for a national ban on arms exports. The referendum on the ban will be held on 29 November.

www.gsoa.ch/english/

IANSA women in Colombia, Macedonia, Senegal and other countries will organise events to mark the 16 Days of Activism against Gender Violence (25 November to 10 December). This year they will focus on urging their governments to take action on their commitments to ending armed violence - including domestic violence - against women. If you are planning an event during the 16 days campaign, please email the details to Meijinder.Kaur@iansa.org

The Ghana Chapter of the West Africa Action Network on Small Arms (WAANSA- Ghana) was officially inaugurated on 3 November in Accra. The event was attended by the Ghanaian Minister of the Interior and other government representatives from the region. Ken Kinney, President of WAANSA-Ghana, said the organisation will work with partners to complement government efforts to ensure security for all.

www.modernghana.com/news/247172/1/ghana-to-ratify-ecowas-convention-on-small-arms-pr.html

A Policy Brief on Guinea published by the West Africa Network for Peacebuilding (WANEP) highlights that the military factor is one of the fundamental issues that must be taken into account when proffering solutions to the country's ongoing crisis. WANEP says Guinean security forces need urgent reform and restructuring since indiscipline and anarchy are supreme within the ranks of the armed forces.

www.wanep.org/image/pb_guinea_nov09.pdf

In 2010 Italy will spend over 23 billion Euros on arms, military missions and the army, according to "Il Caro Armato" a new book co-authored by IANSA member Francesco Vignarca from the Italian Disarmament Network. The book describes the expenditure and wastage by the Italian armed forces.

www.altreconomia.it/site/ec_articolo_dettaglio.php?intId=89

Displacement of people related to climate change- natural disasters

www.irinnews.org

The African Union convention on internally displaced persons promotes regional and national measures "to prevent, mitigate, prohibit, and eliminate the root causes of internal displacement and provide durable solutions." 11 million people are displaced by conflict and climate change-related natural disasters. Three of the world's top five countries with the largest populations of conflict-induced IDPs are Sudan, the Democratic Republic of Congo, and Somalia. Hundreds of thousands more are displaced in Cote d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Kenya, Uganda, and Zimbabwe. Seventeen countries signed the African Union convention on internally displaced persons (IDPs) after years of preparation culminated in a week of meetings in the Ugandan capital but a lot more hard work remains before it becomes effective, according to observers. "The most important step now is implementation," Julia Dolly Joiner, AU commissioner for political affairs, said. "We need to move from intentions to actions." Fifteen countries must ratify the convention before it enters into effect. Organizers of the 19-23 October meetings insisted that the fact that only 17 signed did not represent a lack of political will and commitment on the part of the African states. "We debated together, and we agreed; but, when it comes to signing, the person has to have been given the authority by his government to sign," one AU official told IRIN. "Only 17 had such authorization."

Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni, who chaired the summit, praised it as "a very important milestone [that] has gone beyond conflicts to address issues of development. "We have at least agreed in words, we now have to put our words [into] action," he told a news conference.

Joiner called for international support. "Africa cannot do it alone; that is why we are calling for partnerships," she told IRIN. "We are optimistic that countries will be faithful to their commitments under the convention." The AU will now try to get more signatures, and lobby 15 countries to ratify the convention so it can become a binding document. Observers, however, say much more work needs to be done to generate political will, given that most presidents stayed away from the summit.

The convention addresses the root causes of displacement in Africa, where at least 11 million people are displaced by conflict and climate change-related natural disasters, among other reasons. According to the Brookings-Bern Project, three of the world's top five countries with the largest populations of conflict-induced IDPs are in Africa. These include Sudan, with an estimated 4.9 million IDPs, the Democratic Republic of Congo, with at least one million, and Somalia, where the UN estimates 1.5 million are displaced. Hundreds of thousands more are displaced in Cote d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Kenya, Uganda, and Zimbabwe. Overall, citizens in at least 20 African states are experiencing internal displacement.

Biodiversity, rights, & livelihood

www.grain.org

http://www.grain.org/seedling_files/seed-09-10-low.pdf

Read this analysis and vision re agriculture and climate change. It's from a stark, well-researched magazine, "Seedling".(44 pages) that is available free on line and in paper. It projects the present into the future with great clarity, and provides a very serious challenge to the agricultural industry, and to all of us who get our food from there. Here is the editorial: www.grain.org/seedling/?type=78&l=1 and the contents page.

Foreign land acquisitions: some opportunities, many threats

<http://farmlandgrab.org/8861>

The purchase of African land by foreign companies and governments to grow food and other crops for export has set alarm bells ringing. Some issues speak of : Unprecedented scale ,Demand for food and biofuels ,Towards a strategic approach, Land rights, From Land Grab to Win-Win

Success or failure

"Agreements to lease or cede large areas of land in no circumstance should be allowed to trump the human rights obligations of the states concerned," Mr. De Schutter argues. That goes for both the states receiving the investment and those from which the investments originate. Proposals for such ideal agreements, backed by necessary national legislation and enforcement principles, are being put forward. But, as the IIED study points out, there is already a large gulf between contractual provisions and their enforcement. The gap between the statute books and the reality on the ground may entail serious costs for local communities. A code of conduct for host governments and foreign investors could help ensure that land deals are a "win-win" arrangement for investor and local communities alike, IFPRI suggests. Experts agree that African governments must have the will and the ability to apply laws. "Strengthening the negotiation capacity is vital," Mr. De Schutter argues. And that capacity cannot be of governments alone, he says. Local communities must also be empowered and national parliaments must be involved. Achieving that, many fear, may be the most difficult gap to bridge.

East Africa: At last, common market becomes reality

The East African \(Kenya\) - November 23, 2009.

Nairobi (Kenya) — The East African Community officially ushered in a common market on Friday amid renewed commitment by the region's Heads of State to expedite the envisaged political federation by 2015. The Common Market Protocol was finally signed in Arusha, Tanzania, bringing to an end months of waiting and anxiety. Contentious issues nearly derailed the negotiations and the signing was pushed to this month from April.

At a colourful ceremony to mark the bloc's 10th anniversary which coincided with the bloc's Common Market deal, the chair of the EAC Council of Ministers, Monique Mukaruliza, urged partner states to expedite its ratification at national level by the scheduled July 1, 2010 date.

Presidents Paul Kagame of Rwanda, Mwai Kibaki (Kenya), Yoweri Museveni (Uganda), Pierre Nkurunziza (Burundi), Jakaya Kikwete (Tanzania) and Abeid Amani Karume (Zanzibar) nodded as Ms Mukaruliza said the ball was now in the nations' court. She said Rwanda was the only country in the region with a fast ratification policy, with Tanzania taking the longest time, of four months.

Despite the disparities, she said, the EAC ministers had agreed to work closely with the respective countries to push the necessary ratifications within the shortest time. Also present were the regional integration's forums and officials such as attorneys-general, trade ministers, chief justices, permanent secretaries, and EAC ministers and their deputies.

The coming into force of both the East African Customs Union and the Common Market will lead to a short-term loss of revenue as countries remove internal taxes and harmonise external duties as per the Common External Tariff guidelines. The expected loss is estimated to run into millions of dollars. Rwanda, the only country that has done a full assessment, is looking at a loss of $12 million, but its EAC Permanent Secretary, Robert Ssali, said it is a small price to pay for the expected benefits. At the ceremony, President Kagame handed over the Summit chair to President Kikwete.